from policy makers and may advance through the islature. Gov. Chris Christie, a Republican, has not taken a public position on the package of bills.

Other proposals from Ms. Riley fall well outsithe mainstream and seem unlikely to advance, including a bill to bar colleges from requiring the plans, another that would close public colleges with a six-year graduanti rate below 50 percent, and one quiring the sate auditor to determine whether student fees benefit students.

The proposal that college leaders most concerned about would be tuition and fees for nine semesters for all incoming students at both lic and private colleges in the state.

John B. Wilson, president of the sociation of Independent Cogles and Universities in New Jersey, which represents private colleges, s'aid out clear that the state has the authority to freeze tuition at private institutions.

Assemblywoman Riley, who is also an elementary osl teacher, said that the bills were meant to start a conversation about college costs, that campus leaders we only beginning to understand the impact that tuition ieases have on students and families.

"They're going to have to wake up and get sth'e said. "They do a grejab of educating, but there are things they calo, surely, to cut costs."

The Other Side

When Ms. Riley and her colleagues in the Leagueste talk about cost cutting and efficiency, however, higher-education leaders heavily and redundate regulation.

"Many of these proposals, if nortost, are already done or on they to being done," said Darryl G. Greer, a senior fellow at the William J. Hughe

Lost in Translation: N.J. Lawmakers and Hig Eer Try to Understand Each Other - Govt... P4064