Stockton's 10th Annual Day of Service honored the college's relationship with Atlantic City, bringing more than 300 volunteers to 14 community projects in the city.

In partnership with the City of Atlantic City and the Casino Reinvestment Development Authority (CRDA), the Day of Service brought students, faculty and staff off campus and into the city, marking the first Day of Service to focus on one municipality.

About 14 Stockton students gathered outside Boardwalk Hall Saturday morning, stopping passers-by to ask whether they were registered to vote and offering to register them if not.

Down at Maine and Atlantic avenues in the city's Inlet section, 43 student volunteers including members of Stockton's WaterWatch group and Anthropology Associate Professor Laurie Greene planted 2000 American Beach Grass plants. Their job was to "try to stabilize the beachhead here," after Hurricane Sandy washed away the rocks and landscaping, Greene said.

The CRDA donated the dune grass and provided the services of a landscaper who gave the volunteers a quick lesson on how to plant it, according to Jon Bitzer of the CRDA's Special Improvement District division, who was coordinating planting projects around the city.

Excitingly, four new faculty members are joining the Stockton community this fall. Over the coming weeks, The Times will feature brief bios of our new faculty, by school. Welcome!

Jacob Feige, assistant professor of Art, will be featured in the Campus Art Gallery through Nov. 15. The artwork in the main exhibition, entitled "Jacob Feige: Paintings, 2008-13," features paintings from the last five years. With a focus on abstraction and the North American landscape, Feige establishes relationships between American regional culture, nature, and the unreliability

We want to know about things going on in the Stockton community. Do you have an unusual hobby? Did one of your co-workers win an award or perform outstanding public service? Births, weddings, graduations and the like are all good things to submit to the Stockton Times.
